practice and awareness, these breathing fundamentals become second nature, and you won't have to think about it all the time.

Tone quality is important because your sound is unique to you. Some singers try to imitate their favorites. It's important that you sound like you. The songs in this great collection were originally recorded and sung by some of the most outstanding vocalists of our time. With practice, you can develop a voice that is just as impressive. But you must practice.

Your unique sound should be a natural extension of your speaking voice, so it's very important you sing within your vocal range. If a song is very "rangy," meaning it has low notes as well as high notes, it's not a good song choice for you if you don't sing those notes comfortably. For example, sopranos don't always have the ability to sing very low notes. Kelly Clarkson, an incredible singer, has expanded her range since being a contestant on American Idol. At that time, her lowest note was middle C.

At dress rehearsal early in Season One, Idol judge Randy Jackson was concerned because Kelly altered notes for the beginning of a song she had chosen. I explained to her that the beginning of the song was completely out of her range, and I remember his response. He explained that Kelly's lowest note was middle C. Because she knew her limits and didn't force her singing, her amazing musicality shone through.

George Huff, a marvelous singer from Season Three, came into the competition abruptly after another contestant left, and he made it to the Top 10; however, he came in with only about 55 percent of his vocal ability because he had been ill. He fought to maintain his unique tonal quality by being extremely disciplined and not pushing his voice or his range during the entire contest. Every week, he would say, "It's coming back,
