Music of the 1930s: An Introduction

BY LOREN SCHOENBERG

The 1930s was a time of great change. From the macrocosm of world history to the microcosm of jazz, few decades can rival it in terms of where it began and where it ended. American popular culture was edging toward an all-time high-water mark. In film, radio, popular music, and dance, the quality of sophistication—or better yet, refinement—not only had a chance in the commercial marketplace, but it also actually thrived.

This was a period in which Louis Armstrong's great innovations of the 1920s gradually became the lingua franca of both jazz and much of the commercial music of the day. By the end of decade, Armstrong's phrasing (and, by implication, much of his conception) was everywhere, from Bing Crosby to Billie Holiday to Benny Goodman, Duke Ellington, Count Basie, and Glenn Miller. This may sound simplistic, but listen to a handful of commercial recordings from 1929 and compare them with their 1939 counterparts—the evidence is manifest. Although African-American idioms (not just musical, but also cultural) had long been essential to the American identity, the '30s saw them edge closer and closer to the fore where they rightly belonged. The vehicle for this inevitable change was largely Louis Armstrong. The music that he and other African-American artists had created in the '20s was soon to become the preferred mode of expression for multitudes around the world.

During the early '30s, the Casa Loma Orchestra, a Canadian band that played well-rehearsed, swinging (if a bit stiff) big band jazz, struck a resonant chord among American college youth who were hungering for a new sound to differentiate themselves from the previous generation and their music. The response to the Casa Lomans laid the groundwork for the eventual success of Benny Goodman in 1935, which ushered in the Swing Era. One of the side effects was that many of the African-American bands that had helped define the idiom were also financially rewarded, though on a drastically reduced scale.

The ultimate vehicle for jazz during this era was the big band, which offered an unprecedented opportunity to blend improvisation and composition into a cohesive, yet fluid, medium. The successful marriage of composition and improvisation depends on the soloist's ability to create within the framework designed by the composer/arranger. The more he or she can relate to what came before, what is coming afterward, and what is going on in the background, the better the solo will be. The soloist must draw upon his or her own creativity and find a distinct musical voice, all while making adjustments for the specific context. In this sense, jazz is the aural equivalent of the American Constitution. As John Kouwenhoven wrote in his classic book of essays, The Beer Can by the Highway, the sense of improvisation that the Amendments bring to the Constitution has an equivalent in the spontaneous shifts of form available to the jazz ensemble. Various sections of a composition can be reordered, extended, shortened, and elaborated on as the moment dictates. This is why the big band is often viewed as the ultimate ensemble for jazz. At the drop of a hat, it can swiftly rebuild itself from a solo instrument into any number of different instrumental configurations, and throughout the ensemble it is supported by the strength of the composition at hand. The masters represented in the Essential Jazz Editions managed to strike this all-too-elusive balance between composition and improvisation that delineates the exclusive province of jazz.

The challenge in addressing this classic repertoire today is to honor the essence of the original without stifling one's contemporary artistic identity. Just as literature students return again and again to Shakespeare, let's use this text to get a grounding on where we have been and where we are going. Above all, make it come alive as the relevant, swinging object it is.

Lonesome Road

BY LOREN SCHOENBERG

The line that divided the more artistic bands of the Swing Era from the commercial ones was at times very thin, as demonstrated by the unit led by the great trombone virtuoso Tommy Dorsey. Known as "The Sentimental Gentleman of Swing," Dorsey's smooth playing and frequently unchallenging recordings were very popular in the mid- to late 1930s. The musical highlights came not from the arrangements but from the great soloists he featured, most notably trumpeter Bunny Berigan and tenor saxophonist Bud Freeman. It wasn't until 1939 that Dorsey, secure in his position as a commercial attraction, began to look for more creative writers. Shortly after hiring Sy Oliver away from the Jimmie Lunceford band, Dorsey heard Bill Finegan's arrangement of "Lonesome Road."

What distinguishes even this early effort is Finegan's thematic green thumb, which enabled him to spin one idea into another, creating a unity that was especially rare in the world of commercial dance bands. Another element that distinguishes this arrangement is the constant use of modulation. By changing keys, Finegan created a whole new set of relationships that he could exploit in his attempt to tie things together. He used orchestral timbres to link ideas from chorus to chorus and subtle but daring reharmonizations that elaborate on the original melody while allowing it to retain its essential profile. The solo sections never sound like separate entities, but are spun right out of the ensemble, to which they return. These facets of composition call for an extraordinarily high level of insight, and Finegan clearly had them all, even at this early stage of his career.

With Sy Oliver just coming aboard, Dorsey was unable to take on yet another arranger; nonetheless, he still recorded Finegan's "Lonesome Road" in its entirety. Pieces that covered both sides of a 78-rpm disc—much less those written by a total unknown—were rare in those days. Dorsey then recommended the young Finegan to a friend who was still struggling to get his band off the ground. The friend was Glenn Miller, and within months Finegan's version of "Little Brown Jug" catapulted the Miller band to fame.

Finegan led an Army band in World War II and eventually joined Dorsey full time in 1946. He had continued to evolve as a writer and by this time was one of the most distinctive and innovative stylists of the genre. To his credit, Dorsey didn't balk at the more unconventional aspects of Finegan's creativity and recorded many pieces that continue to startle listeners.

Finegan hooked up with the equally original composer Eddie Sauter in the early 1950s, and their recording of "Doodletown Fifers" was a surprise hit. This success enabled them to keep their large jazz orchestra together throughout the decade, and their recorded legacy (which includes an album with the Chicago Symphony) remains as vital and as challenging as it does obscure. In part, their sophisticated use of instruments, such as the glockenspiel and auxiliary percussion, turned off many listeners (including most jazz fans) who couldn't hear the sense of irony that undergirded the brilliant writing—not unlike the music of Mahler or, for that matter, Ellington.

Finegan gradually gave up writing for teaching and has continued to mentor several generations of jazz composers. Both Jim Hall and Bob Brookmeyer are among those who still look to Finegan for advice.

Notes for the Performer

BY JOEY SELLERS

The orchestral feel of this arrangement is typical of Bill Finegan's style. Packed with dynamic and textural contrasts, the arrangement's harmonic substitutions, unique for their day, foreshadowed techniques that would become commonplace. The intelligent use of interludes and varied orchestrations at the "seams" of the arrangement (the end of phrases leading to the next section or phrase) gives the chart a cohesion that otherwise might not exist in an arrangement with so many different-sounding sections.

Special points of interest:

- The use of the introductory material throughout the entire chart lends a sense of cohesion to this extended arrangement. The chart is nicely "book-ended" by the reintroduction of the very first notes we hear from the pianist, Dorsey's brief four-measure recap of the melody, and the restatement of the ensemble's introductory material.
- The harmonic substitutions at m. 23 are elegantly handled.
- The trombone soli at m. 61 permits us to hear Dorsey playing in a more assertive style than his ballad playing, for which he is better known.
- The perfect registration of the clarinet lead soli at m. 85 allows the voicings to ring particularly clearly. The tenors on the bottom do not stand out because of their perfectly placed voicings.
- The sudden reintroduction of Dorsey after the extended shout chorus nicely ties the whole affair together.

The Smithsonian Institution, the world's largest museum, education, and research complex, comprises 16 museums, the National Zoo, and research facilities and hosts 30 million visitors a year. In 1971, the Smithsonian established a presence in jazz that has grown to become one of the world's most comprehensive set of jazz programs. The National Museum of American History holds major collections of jazz memorabilia, artifacts, and oral histories, including famous icons such as Dizzy Gillespie's trumpet and the 200,000-page Duke Ellington archive. The museum's resident jazz band, the Smithsonian Jazz Masterworks Orchestra, under Artistic and Musical Director David N. Baker, tours nationally and internationally, conducts educational programs, and is heard on the "Jazz Smithsonian" public radio series. The Smithsonian mounts exhibitions and traveling exhibitions on jazz and produces historical recordings, video programs, books, music editions, Web sites, and educational projects on jazz. The Smithsonian also undertakes research projects in jazz and offers fellowships for research in its holdings.

In its historic role as depository for all copyrighted works, the Library of Congress is probably the oldest collector of jazz documents. In addition to its collections of manuscripts and printed music registered for copyright, the Library of Congress has sound recordings in all formats, including the famous oral history of Jelly Roll Morton made at the Library. Since then, it has acquired an extensive archive of commercial disks as well as unique broadcast and studio recordings, which have been augmented by recordings of performances sponsored by the Library. Its jazz archives—which have been augmented in recent years by gifts from Ella Fitzgerald and Gerry Mulligan of their complete manuscripts, and purchases of the archives of bassist/composer Charles Mingus, photographer William Gottlieb, and Ellington recording collector Jerry Valburn—now comprise one of the most important collections of jazz documents anywhere.
