About the Music

This work is a traditional march written in the style of the renowned American composers Henry Fillmore, Karl King, and John Phillip Sousa. It incorporates all of the standard formal elements of the march, including first and second strains, the dogfight, and a trio that modulates to the key of the subdominant. In addition, the trio is embellished with an upper woodwind obbligato part that returns for the final grand statement. There is a wide variety of dynamics used, keeping with modern march interpretations.

In performance, the overall approach should be light and crisp, with distinct articulations and plenty of separation between staccato notes. The recurring eighth-note motif in the lower instruments (appearing initially in measure 3) should not be overplayed, because it may cause tempo to bog down. The second strain should be marked by contrasts between bold tutti statements and delicate woodwind interludes. Percussion should provide rhythm and drive throughout, but should always accompany the winds tastefully without dominating.

At the key change, the exposition of the trio melody should be light, providing a sharp dynamic contrast to the previous section. Strive for a homogenous blend between clarinets and saxophones. The texture and dynamic will build naturally as more instruments are introduced. The breakstrain (or dogfight) should be somewhat bombastic, yet tasteful and musical. In the final grand statement beginning at measure 119, strive for a careful balance with all elements clearly and equally represented.
