About the Music

Intense and driving rhythms have long been associated with ancient as well as modern tribal rituals. Tribal Dance conjures images of these large and often mystic gatherings. The opening theme is bold and aggressive, marked by well-articulated rhythms in both melodic and harmonic voices. The middle section, more dark and mysterious in nature, reflects some of the more sacred practices that continue to leave a sense of wonder in many who have studied these rituals. Some are said to even have the presence of magic. The final section unifies the work and reiterates the intense rhythms and themes from the opening, while offering slight variations as the work comes to a dramatic close.

While not required, piano is recommended, particularly beginning in measure 23. It will be helpful with smaller orchestras, especially those that may not have lower string voices.

The optional percussion parts add to the overall effect. In place of the floor tom, directors may wish to use a bass drum placed on its side and played with sticks, for a deep yet crisp sound. It is also possible to perform the piece with low tom only. For a more dramatic effect still, consider adding a few percussionists around the audience and having them begin at the downbeat of measure 21. To avoid balance issues with the strings (especially with smaller groups), offstage percussionists should stop after measure 35 and reenter at measure 61. If balance is not a problem, they may begin playing again at measure 45.
